President's message

Thank you all for your participation in our seminar in early January. We had a great time with the astro-landscape photographer, Rick Whitacre.

During the seminar, many people showed their interest in attending Rick's one-day workshop. There are two possible ways to attend his workshop. First, you can register via his website for his individual workshop. Alternatively, if we have enough group members showing interest, we can coordinate with him to organize a workshop mainly for our members. That way, we can get a discount from him. If the latter is interesting to you, please email me so we can plan ahead.

Regarding Facebook we use for our club, there are two links. One is for our private closed group (<https://www.facebook.com/groups/101photo/>) and the other one is public (<https://www.facebook.com/groups/1563746127248796/>). The private one is only for paid members. I encourage you to post your image(s) to either link and to provide constructive feedback on others' image(s). That way, we can benefit from critiques to improve our image(s).

On Feb 2nd (Tuesday), we have an internationally famous portrait photographer, Hanson Fong, as our speaker. He will also host a one-day workshop on Feb 6th. If you want to learn tips on taking professional and artistic portraits, you should not miss this opportunity. He will cover the fundamentals to advanced so do not worry about your skill set. Hanson's 2-hour seminar on Feb 2nd is a regular club meeting, which is free for members. His one-day workshop on Feb 6th requires a registration fee, but there is a significant discount for members. Also, if you register before 1/30/2016, there is further discount. For details, please see inside this newsletter.

Thanks very much for your interest in reading this newsletter. I encourage you to join us in various meaningful ways, such as becoming a member, attending our seminars or workshops and providing your images and critiques on our websites. Our goal is to provide a supportive learning environment to advance our members' knowledge and skills in photography.

Happy Lunar New Year!!

Participant Testimonial from Vivian Chen

I recently had a chance to attend a short seminar with Hanson Fong in San Francisco. Before the seminar, I was aware that Hanson was a globally recognized wedding and portrait photographer. I enjoyed his seminar and was inspired by his professionalism and expert techniques. Hanson's seminar is engaging, interactive, fun and informative. His speech is lively and humorous with lots of illustrations. Live shootings with the model are also included.

Within his session, Hanson clearly demonstrated the importance of lighting and several lighting techniques, including using natural and studio lighting. One unique aspect of the seminar is the classic 10 poses that Hanson pioneered. Hanson illustrates the poses and lighting by presenting his beautiful and glamour portraits and wedding photos. You won't be disappointed. Flow posing, body shifting, and facial analysis are covered in his discussions. I still remember his demonstration of the "high shoulder" and "low shoulder" concepts. When someone takes a photo of me today, I find myself applying Hanson's posing techniques to make my own portraits stand out.

Hanson says, "Successful photographers always tell a story. You have to create mood in your photography". I always keep this in mind when I photograph now.

The 101 Photo Club kicked off its first meeting on January 5. After a social mixer featuring tasty snacks and treats by Jessica Wai, attendees listened to featured presenter and gifted photographer, Rick Whitacre. Rick presented his own tips on how to achieve spectacular results. Although most would probably not consider sleeping on a cold beach to capture celestial events that may or may not happen, Rick gave many practical tips that a lot of aspiring landscape photographers will add to their technical repertoire. After the presentation, Rick resolved and critiqued photographs from various members in attendance.

Article: Mixing Landscape Photography and Family Vacations

By Ken Fong

Many photographers find it difficult to combine good landscape photography with family vacations, and are often resigned to taking just good snapshots in less than ideal (mid-day) light. The best light usually occurs when the rest of the family wants to enjoy a special dinner. And unless the other family members are also photographers, nobody wants to wait around with you for the best light when they are either hungry or interested in other activities. My earlier experience of trying to take good landscape photographs on a family vacation often ended up with some tension.

Today, I've resolved not to let "magic light" get in the way of family time. Capturing spectacular light while being absent at the meals sends a very bad message to your family members. I strive to keep mealtimes holy.

So how does one enjoy a family vacation without denying one's passion for great photography? If you have any tips to share, or have a humorous story of trying to take photography on a family vacation, please send them to news@101photoclub.com and we will compile them in a future article. Below are some of the methods that have worked for me.

Get up early

A routine that worked for me in Kauai was to wake early (which is easy to do given the time zone differences), head out to a site and photograph, then come back with bagels and mochas as the family is waking up. To implement this plan, you would need to know the targets (and bakeries) in your immediate area. Google Earth and The Photographer's Ephemeris are great tools for planning, but note that these tools might also influence your choice of hotel if there is a particular site in mind, or influence your choice of dates if you are trying to time and align celestial objects.

Go out late

Family time over? Consider some night photography outside...there might be a good chance of dark sky to make those Milky Way compositions pop.

Be creative with mid-day light

If your family members are engaged in their own activities during mid-day, you can still do some interesting things with the high contrast light that we usually despise.

Suggestions include:

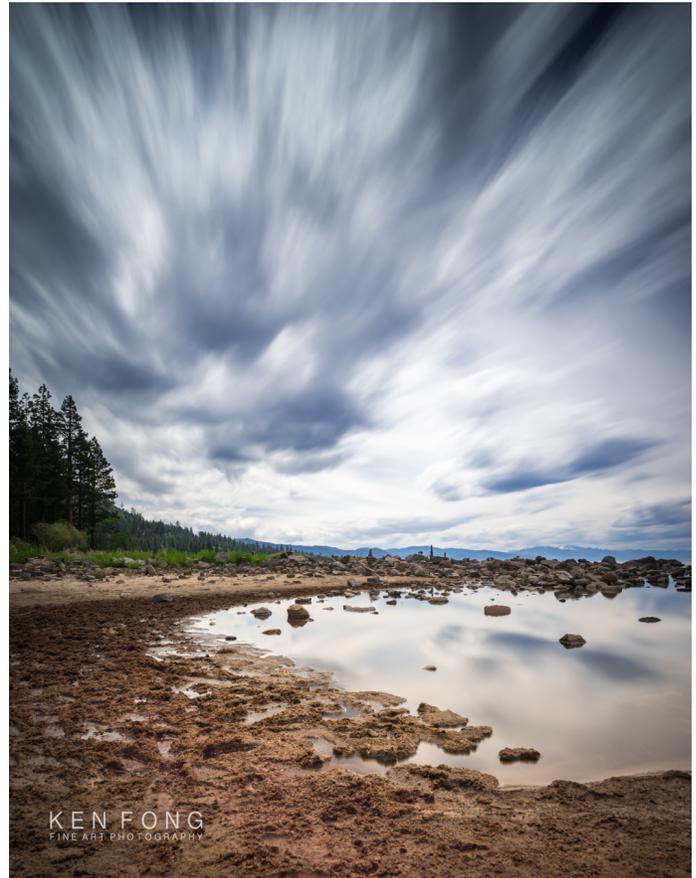

- 1) bracketing for HDR to resolve shadows
- 2) long exposures to make people disappear
- 3) 3-stop graduated ND filters

Take a break from landscape photography

Open up your aperture and try being a street photographer to photograph your family discretely. Capture the moments that your family will appreciate later.

Go Light

I used to pack medium format gear for vacations and remember seeing my wife roll her eyes when I brought it out or lugged it around. Since then, I've switched to a mirrorless kit which includes an ultralight and compact tripod. From my experience, compact or mirrorless cameras are more discrete than DSLRs and evoke a more positive reaction when you pull it out of your bag.

This photograph was taken at mid-day with swarms of beachgoers and kayakers inside the composition. An ND filter enabled a 3-minute exposure which produced dramatic cloud lines AND invisible people.*

About the Cover “Mount Fuji Rivers of Light” Photographer: Ken Fong

The Rivers of Light photograph is a composite of two images taken a few minutes apart in Shimizu (Tomei Expressway, Shizouka, Japan). When I first arrived at the site, Mount Fuji was lit with a setting sun; however, it was too early for the traffic to turn on their lights. Just a few minutes later, Mount Fuji went into deep shadow, and the cars turned on their lights. This composition can be taken in one shot if the conditions are right, but the photographer has a very short window to capture it...if it is too early, there are no headlight streaks; if it is too late, the background becomes too dark. Photographing with a composite in mind gives the photographer more options in post-processing.

Camera settings: Sony A7r, ISO 100, 60mm, f11. I used a 2-stop graduated ND to tame the sky. The shutter speed is determined by how long it takes for a car to make it all the way from the front to where it disappears...in this case, it was 20 seconds. Post-processing was done with Lightroom for adjustments and Photoshop for compositing. In this type of exposure, it is better to err on the side of more time versus less time. If you cut the exposure too short, it results in a less favorable (incomplete) streak of light. The other thing you need is traffic, which is hard to find in Japan because most people are taking public transit!
